I went to my local Best Buy store because I needed technical support with my palm. What I didn't know was that they don't support the device, they just sell it. For support, good though the slightly different girl at geek squad desk said, you need to call Palm customer service. The philosophy of long queues at a busy 800-number or voice-recorded signals flashed in my mind. How is it possible that the most important part for customers — the service — is left to customers to figure out? I didn't know how true that statement would be until I met Jim. Jim the gentleman who was waiting for his laptop and recovered the hard drive when he saw that I was about to step away from the counter without getting help. Maybe it was the shoes I was wearing that caught his attention, or the accent he couldn't quite replace. We started talking. And during our conversation, a long one in which we became absorbed, he proceeded to help me with my palm problem. I have one too, it's another model, but I know what happens when it freezes like this, he said. At that time we were still at the Best Buy customer service counter. Other customers were coming and going. A good young woman who was picking up a piece of equipment talked with us about her legacy — Japanese and Italian. She was quite striking and very cordial. In the meantime, no one was getting uneasy, nobody complained about us standing right in front of the counter. Many joined the conversation, even as distant listeners. People can't help it; Others are a matter of constant attraction. Different, interesting and engaging are all words I will use to describe the experience. And we looked quite right at home where we were. So thought that happened to me. We were talking about innovation in business and how innovation is mostly about seeing the same things and seeing something different. What if best buy were to encourage those conversations to provide space? What if instead of just having a counter, where by necessity - being short on employees, needing long-time help - they placed a nice set of chairs and small tables nearby. Customers could sit down. Some coffee company could provide coffee and snacks. People who leave since work can enjoy a little while waiting. Importantly, what if they helped customers talk with each other The place there for them to do so? Jim solved my palm problem and I walked away made a new friend and feel good about best buy. Instead of going down the feeling, I now have a warm and fuzzy feeling about the store where I had such a good experience. Never mind that it wasn't the staff providing it. I had it anyway, and it's connected with the store. Let's take the idea a little further and think about what would happen if Brian, another customer, stopped in for a repair and learned during the wait that Jane, also waiting, knows everything about digital cameras. He's thinking about buying one, but he seems playful about asking shop staff. He doesn't want to be sold yet; He wants to buy after taking his time in search of options. They strike a conversation, and now Bill writes down a list of the features he wants in a camera. Jane just asked her how she was thinking about using it to add stories of her purchase and what she learned from them. We all love to learn, we all hate to study and many of us dislike research, especially when we feel harried in store. The business gets to keep your costs down by helping to maintain a certain number of geeks on hand. Customers also get help from other customers and help them. And the store now has more selling potential, all to be well wrapped up well. But wait, you say, what if I'm the only one there on a given night? Word of mouth travels faster than information about fiber optic cables, you can:- Wait until someone else comes to help - I was probably less than two hours and the flow of people was stable - select yourself as a go person for some types of equipment and volunteer support, while you like people in it to be helpful and don't have time to visit networking events to meet new people. Businesses that can help reduce barriers to entry to interact between customers win. Now, how about a good cup of coffee, you guessed it, buy the best? I was thinking of buying a digital camera ...
